

When you turn 68

Before you turn 68, you and your manager should maintain a close dialogue about your employment and the needs of the organisation. Your employment protection will change once you are 68. You can continue to work as normal until either you or your employer terminate your employment. The law has been formulated in such a way that notice must be given before employment can be terminated. This also applies to retirement pensions.

Resignation

Information is available on the My employment/Leaving SLU pages.

Leaving SLU? | Staff web

The employer terminates your employment

An employer may terminate your employment after you have turned 68. Before any decision is taken, you will be notified in writing that your employer is considering terminating your employment.

Your employment can be terminated without there being any objective grounds or negotiation, however you or your union can request a meeting with the employer before the decision is taken.

The notice period is one month and you will not be entitled to right of priority for re-employment.

Contact your manager if you have any questions.